Brieflife Stories

A influx of about 400 international and domestic vessels to Northland is expected this season, with tourism booking up fast and businesses prepping.

From November to May the region becomes a hotspot for travellers seeking solace from hurricane season or domestic travellers wanting a change of scene.

This year around 250 boats are expected in Whangarei Harbour, whereas the average over the past few years has sat near 140.

Whangarei Marina is already booked for the summer season and assistant manager Sharon Beck and the team are doing their best to make rooms.

"This is a destination marina and we market right onto the Pacific and the Pacific Islands," she said.

"The more boats that come, the more services they require and the more businesses start up to do all that work, so it's a real symbiosis and it's working well."

Boats continue to get bigger too, thanks to navigational systems becoming easier and money with less experience choosing the boat life.

"There's a lot of boats with younger people now, they have an income off their full-time careers, whereas their adventures over the world," Beck said.

"Over the past 10 years, it's been more and more often retired, but this younger syndrome has influenced a lot of younger people to go out and do it."

Travellers visit from across the world, with the biggest market being the United States, plus those from other countries such as Germany, France, the Netherlands and occasionally Japan and Russia docking.

Those people dock for about six months and the boats for Christmas before coming back to explore New Zealand and work on their boats.

Most of the spending happens at Whangarei's marine services with repair work, new sails, engine work, paint jobs and parts required. "It brings a lot of money, especially the bigger ones. Their average spend is estimated to be $50,000."

Growth continues across the marine industry in Whangarei, such as Port Nikau adding to its offerings with 48 new berths this year. It's quickly establishing Whangarei as a world-class spot for berthing and maintenance. Port Nikau marine manager Blair Senead says.

"Our tradespeople offer everything needed to support our visitors, right there in our city."

Senead said he was keen to continue promoting Whangarei as a premier marine hub for the South Pacific.

"If we can extend our marketing reach internationally and attract a steady stream of boats to Whangarei, I believe the positive impact on the town could be transformative."

That would include more local employment and business opportunities, including engaging more people into the area.

Senead said there had been a push to attract more superyachts to Northland that bring substantial economic benefits.

While Port Nikau's recreational berths typically accommodate vessels of between 12m and 30m, the superyacht marina can host vessels that are up to 200m long.

"When superyachts visit, their crews and guests love to engage in activities like sailing, diving, hiking, sailing, fishing, kite surfing and more, which is perfect for showcasing and supporting Northland's natural attractions and local businesses."

He said there had been an increase in superyacht inquiries compared with recent years.

"While the numbers are steadily climbing, they haven't quite reached pre-Covid levels yet, but interest is clearly on the rise."

About 75% of those travelling to Northland from international waters get their craft checked in the Bay of Islands Opua, according to New Zealand Marine Operators Association chairman and Fair North Holdings general manager Chris Goddard.

He expects to see more domestic travellers on top of international arrivals.

"I think New Zealanders are looking forward to coming out of
