Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether the use of a computer-based program could improve the accuracy of the measurement of intraocular pressure (IOP) by Goldmann field perimeter (GFP). A total of 60 eyes were measured by GFP before and after the use of the computerized program. The mean IOP values were compared between the two measurements. The results showed that the mean IOP values were significantly higher after the use of the computerized program than before. The use of a computer-based program can improve the accuracy of the measurement of IOP by GFP.

There is a growing body of research that suggests that the use of technology in the classroom can improve student learning. This research is based on a variety of studies that have shown that students who use technology in the classroom are more likely to be engaged in their learning, to learn more effectively, and to retain information for a longer period of time. This research also suggests that the use of technology in the classroom can help to reduce the achievement gap between students from different backgrounds. As a result, many educators are now turning to technology as a way to improve student learning and to make the classroom a more effective learning environment.
