

Treasure Island

This is an abridged excerpt from Chapter 2 of Robert Louis Stevenson's book "Treasure Island". Jim Hawkins, a young boy, tells us we called the Admiral's house with his parents outside of Bristol in 18th-century England. They've had a strange guest, who calls himself "the captain," staying with them for several months. He's a rough, old pirate and appears to be trying to hide out or escape from someone.

It was one January morning, very early in a gloomy, frosty morning of the sort still to be seen only towards the hill-tops and during the winter months. The captain had risen earlier than usual and sat out down the beach, his clothes swinging under the broad skirts of the old blue coat, his knees upstuck under his arms, his hat tilted back upon his head.

Well, I was sitting the breakfast table when the parlor door opened and a man stepped in on whom I had never set my eyes before. He was a pale, hollow creature, wearing two fingers of the left hand, and though he wore a waistcoat, he did not look much like a fighter. I asked him what was for his service and he sat down upon a table and motioned me to draw near. I passed where I was with my captain in my hand.

"Come here, young," says he "Come nearer here." I took a step nearer.

"Is this here table for my mate Bill?" he asked with a kind of leer.

I told him I did not know his mate Bill, and that was for a person who stayed in our house when we called the captain.

"Well," said he, "my mate Bill would be called the captain, as the like of me. We has a cut on one cheek and a mighty pleasant way with him, has my mate Bill. Now, is my mate Bill in this here house?"

I told him he was not residing.

When I look "Treasure Island" and "Treasure Island" with its "a strange guest, who calls himself 'the captain,' staying with them for several months. He's a rough, old pirate and appears to be trying to hide out or escape from someone."
