Student performance on the Test of Scientific Literacy Skills (TOSLS) does not change with assignment of a low-stakes grade

Abstract

Objective: Response-validated multiple-choice assessments are used in college courses to assess student learning gains. The ability of a test to accurately reflect student learning gains is highly dependent on the students' effort. Within our institution, lackluster student effort is common on response-validated multiple-choice concept assessments that are not included as a portion of the semester grade but are used to inform curricular changes. Thus, we set out to determine whether increasing testing stakes by assigning a grade on student performance had an effect on student score and self-reported effort. The Test of Scientific Literacy Skills (TOSLS) is a response-validated multiple-choice assessment used to measure scientific literacy in undergraduates. We administered the TOSLS to students enrolled in a general education Biology course, both during the first 2 weeks (pretest) and the last 2 weeks (posttest) of the course.

Results: Self-reported effort and TOSLS performance were significantly correlated in the ungraded cohort. This relationship did not exist in the graded sections. Our data indicate that assigning a low-stakes grade has no significant effect on mean student performance or self-reported effort on the TOSLS within our general education course.

Keywords: Test of Scientific Literacy Skills (TOSLS), Response-validated multiple-choice assessments, Low-stakes testing, No-stakes testing, Student effort

Introduction

In recent years, undergraduate institutions have sought to reform the curriculum of Biology courses according to recommendations from the American Association for the Advancement of Science Vision & Change (V&C) in Undergraduate Biology Education Initiative [1–3]. At our institution we have also incorporated V&C recommendations into general education Biology courses including inquiry-based laboratory modules that allow students to experience science as a process, opportunities to engage with the content through active and collaborative learning methodologies, and additional opportunities for science communication.

Our ultimate goal is for our general education Biology courses to help non-science majors develop scientific literacy, the ability to identify data generated from scientifically-sound studies, and the ability to organize, analyze, and draw conclusions from this data [4]. In 2012 Gormally et al. [4] developed the Test of Scientific Literacy Skills (TOSLS) as a resource for biology instructors to evaluate their students' proficiencies in scientific literacy, including the identification and analysis of data that contributes to building scientific knowledge. We decided to use this tool to determine whether the curricular changes we were implementing were resulting in scientific literacy learning gains.
