

The text, '12 Angry Men' by Reginald Rose discovered and explored the ideas of belief, one being a powerful motivator factor during the trial that's being displayed amongst the jurors. Jurors came into the courtroom with a pre-determined mindset, judging by the looks of the defendant and criticising him before they came to sit down and realised all the facts that's been laid out on the table. This secured mindset that they had from the start became a powerful motivator in what they personally believed and the verdict that they want to reach within the courtroom. This clearly demonstrated how they were shaped and formed as a person, how personal issues in their life affected them and the way they view things in a different perspective. However, as the text progressed through the text and all the jurors communicated with each other, they slowly started to lure into the fact that the defendant was actually 'not guilty'. 12 Angry Men is an intriguing text that reflects on society's values and how one's personal experience can affect decision-making within the jury room. It is revealed through the 3rd juror's complex relationship with his son that made him incredibly critical towards the defendant and therefore, voted guilty. Not only that, but the 7th juror also approached this issue in a foolish manner as he was 'fence sitting' on the case and only worried about attending his baseball game. Having said that, Juror 10 is the second antagonist in this text as he was prejudiced against the defendant due to the neighbourhood that he came from and automatically thought that he is guilty beyond doubt. Throughout the text, there were many careless jurors that made their own decisions through personal values and not objective ones.

Juror 3 was a stubborn and rather complicated man who had an entangled relationship with his son and therefore greatly impacted on the decision that was made within the court with the mindset of what he wanted to believe. From the start, the 3rd Juror's mind was already set on the boy's guilt as he saw his own son's guilt through the accused. Not only that he had a bad relationship with his son but he also seemed to bottle up his emotions a lot as well as swallowed down the pathway of being strictly harsh on defendant and stayed secured on his decision from the beginning to the end. He found it difficult to separate his own son between the accused as his broken, complex relationship with his own son made him stereotyped against younger generations (ageism). The attitude and negative vibe that he gave off to the readers was rather complex as he had a stubborn, unpleasant energy towards younger boys in which caused lots of fights with his son in the past. This is shown through the quote of how his son 'hit him in the face' and how he 'haven't seen him in two years.' This fact led him to a strong-willed outcome on what he personally believed about the defendant and how his son was one of the reasons why he thought like this. The broken relationship between him and his son really impacted on the decision he made throughout the jury room.

Self-interest was highlighted and brought upon the 7th Juror's perspective amongst the jury. He clearly doesn't care about the facts or evidence that was laid down on the table as he was perfectly fine with letting the guilty man go or an innocent man die alone as long as he makes it to his baseball game, being that it is his top priority. From the beginning, he believed that being in the jury room was a complete waste of time and was therefore so eager to leave to attend his baseball game. was already eager to leave the jury room since the whole case was useless arguing over and how his own time was being wasted when he could be attending his baseball game at that very moment. Not only that, but later during the end, he only accepted the fact that the boy was 'not guilty' as he had enough of dealing with the whole situation and just wanted to get it over and done with so that he could do better things like going to his baseball game that day. Hence, the case of this murder didn't matter to Juror 7 one little bit because he was so caught up with his baseball game and didn't think of anything else regardless.

Juror 10 came off as an obnoxious person who has a nasty personality and showed a prejudice side of him throughout the jury room. One of the main reasons as to why he voted
