

JAMES PATTERSON

I looked up at him and he kissed my hair. I couldn't help thinking about what an absolutely terrific guy he was. I brought my attention back to the judge. He was telling about the experimental laboratory that the kids called the School.

"I read the reports on what happened at the School, the horrifying lab that defies description, and my mind easily rejects the words. . . . Had experiments been conducted on rabbits or chimpanzees, I could cite chapter and section finding criminality in the heinous way the victims were treated. But the crimes that have been committed against these children bear no resemblance to science and medicine as it has ever been practiced, even in the darkest ages of human understanding."

There was a sob from across the room. It came from Andrea Taranto. She looked as though she couldn't take any more. Others in the room burst into tears.

Judge Dwyer continued. "I understand that the people who committed these acts are gone, jailed, or dead. Over the past two days I have seen the tragic results of their unspeakable crimes. There are innocents involved. And I don't mean just the children. As Mr. Kussel said in his opening statement, there are no bad people here. But my job is to concern myself with the children, and what is best for them."

The judge took off his reading glasses and placed them on his desk. He stood around his chambers.

"Here is my decision. . . . The petitioners, Dr. O'Neill and Mr. Brennan, have taken on the task of demonstrating that the custody of these minors by their parents would be detrimental to their well-being. They state that the children will not be happy, or safe, with their biological parents. The chil-den seem to believe this as well. That's important to this court. It carries weight with me. But Dr. O'Neill and Mr. Brennan have not sufficiently proved their case. Not today anyway. Accordingly, I must rule that the children stay with their parents."

Suddenly I felt incredibly empty and hollowed-out, as if I had lost my own children. Hot tears were streaming down my cheeks. I held in a scream of despair.

"However," Judge Dwyer continued, "this is a temporary order. There is a contingency mandated by law that I hold another hearing at a later date. If, as Dr. O'Neill posits, this 'luck' fails to arrive, I will reverse this ruling. Dr. O'Neill, Mr. Brennan, please accept my regrets. I'm sorry. I know you love these children like your own."

A clerk slipped quietly into the room and handed the judge a note. He put on his glasses, read the note, and then did something unexpected — he smiled.

"Mr. and Mrs. Stern, Mrs. Taranto, Mr. and Mrs. Chen, Mr. and Mrs. Marshall, the children have returned from 'a spin' around the Capitol Building and are waiting for you in Courtroom Seven. You may take them home."
