

School Uniforms Should Be Removed in Schools

The annual school uniforms sales in the U.S. averages one billion, three hundred million (Statistic Brain). That's a great deal of money towards something that the majority of student's dread. School uniforms are typically worn in private schools but are becoming required at some public schools. The average student doesn't want to wake up in the morning and put the same thing on every day. Or want to wear the same thing as their peers. This is exactly what school uniforms encourage. In article on Listland titled, "Top 10 Reasons School Should Be Mandatory", writer Dave Anderson gives a variety of reasons why he supports school uniforms. However, these reasons are opinions that I beg to differ. While some may argue for school uniforms they encourage conformity, restrict a student's freedom of expression and have no proven benefit.

School uniforms promote conformity rather than individuality. This can have a negative effect on a child figuring out their self-image. How are they going to express themselves if they're constantly told to wear the same thing as their peers? In the op-ed written by Anderson, one of his first points states how uniforms improve professionalism and enhance image. He goes so far as to say, "Schools should be schools and not fashion shows" (Anderson). Grade schools are full of kids, not adults. Why improve professionalism and enhance the image of a child? Children should be able to freely express who they are by developing their own style. We are always told to be ourselves and be unique but uniforms encourage the opposite. They motivate social conformity which results in sameness and lack of student creativity and individuality. A peer reviewed article from Editors Commentary is about school uniforms in elementary school. The author, Randy Rockney is surprised to find out that his child's school has a
