

The Respiratory System

Usually when we think about the respiratory system all we think about is breathing. But, the respiratory system is so much more. The respiratory system is a system of organs functioning in respiration and consisting especially of the nose, nasopharynx, larynx, trachea, bronchi, and lungs. The respiratory systems purpose is to take in oxygen and breathe out carbon dioxide, by taking in the good air and getting rid of the bad air it allows us to oxygenate our cells and which provides the rest of our body the nutrients it needs. One of the first steps of the respiratory system is the external respiration, which is when the exchange of air in the lung capillaries happen.

Oxygen is inhaled into alveoli and is passed into the capillaries and carbon dioxide is passed from the capillaries into the alveoli to be exhaled. The second step is called the internal respiration where the exchange of gases in the cells take place. Oxygen is passed through the bloodstream into the tissues back into the bloodstream to travel to the lungs. It also works with the circulatory system to transfer blood and oxygen throughout the body. By working with the circulatory system, it ensures that our body gets the proper amounts of oxygen and nutrients we need to survive and keep our bodies functioning properly.

The major organs that make up the respiratory system consist of the three major parts: the airway, the lungs, and the muscles of respiration. Within those three major parts, there are organs that aid and pave the way for a healthy respiratory system. The airway, which includes the nose (Nasal cavity), mouth (Oral cavity), pharynx, larynx, trachea, bronchi, and bronchioles, carries air between the lungs and the body's exterior. The lungs which are in the chest cavity
