

An essay on study skills

Having scrutinized the word cloud posted by the coordinator, Dr. Tame, on facebook, I noticed that there are a great number of study skills associated tips being highlighted in different size in order of their importance and wider use. As far as I am concerned, among these tips, note-taking, a wise selection of pertinent references, regular practice, effective learning styles and going beyond textbooks, altogether, are deemed the primary tips students should be conscious of while they are at college. This essay will cast as much light as possible on some of these widely chosen tips respectively.

Admittedly, for any student to attain a successful higher education, he/ she should keep in mind that taking notes while attending lectures is of much more importance. Wrongly viewed is that attending courses on a regular basis would be sufficient to get satisfactory grades; yes, this would be right provided that it is backed up by note-taking skills: with a notebook, students can, at any time, go back to the notes they already jotted down in the classroom. In other words, it simplifies the process of revision and helps avoid cramming. It is noteworthy to mention that this tip effectively works in the situations where there are a lot of subject to revise. Additionally, taking notes should not be narrowly viewed in the sense that it should also be done before stepping into the lecture in order that you manifest an active participation during the lecture.

In accordance with the above, taking notes skills go in conjunction with being skilful in singling out the most appropriate references that are compatible with the syllabus goals. Nowadays, the research has shown that one of the hurdles that are more likely to hinder students' success at schools is when they are flooded with more resources, which makes it really hard for them to be selective. This trend of being equipped with tons of books in hard papers and in digital format might look a plus for this generation, but I do believe that this huge number of references should be dealt with wisely, which is to say that students ought to have a look at the content and be able to pinpoint the chapters of much importance rather than wasting time scanning chapters which do not fit in the goals targeted.

There is no denying that being an active listener considerably helps in grasping the main goals lectured during a class session. Yet, this might be more liable to be a futile skill if it is not assisted by a regular practice. It is very advisable to practice the ideas and the content dealt with in the class. One argument in favor of the regular revision and practice is that it
