2. What are characteristics of realistic mathematics education?

Realistic mathematics education has five characteristics: (1) use real-life contexts as a starting point for learning; (2) use models as a bridge between abstract and real, that help students learn mathematics at different levels of abstractions; (3) use student's own production or strategy as a result of their doing mathematics; (4) interaction is essential for learning mathematics between teacher and students, students and students; and (5) connection to among strands, to other disciplines, and to meaningful problems in the real world.

3. How is realistic approach is related to the constructivist approach?

The realistic approach is similar to the socio-constructivist approach, except in socio-constructivist does not produce heuristics that can guide the development of instructional activities for students. In other words, in socio-constructivist approach, the teacher does not use heuristics, a method of solving problems by learning from past experience and investigating practical ways of finding a solution. In RME, it is known as guided reinvention.

4. How to design mathematics lessons based on the realistic approach?

The mathematics lessons that will be designed should represents all of the characteristics of RME especially in the material, activity, and assessment part of lesson plan. The way of embed these characteristics into the lesson plan components can be seen in the summary of previous section and an example of complete lesson plan that is designed based on the realistic approach can be seen in the appendix.
