

The Role Play in Drug Addiction Treatment

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

The description of the client's case

The client is a well-educated, talkative, and quite attentive Italian attorney between the ages of twenty and thirty who is addicted to cocaine. He uses cocaine almost every day after work, 5-6 times a week, and claims that it helps him focus and keeps him productive. The client has a very stressful job. He has many things to do and tasks, so two hours of sleep is what he has. As for relations with his family, he rarely communicates with relatives once a month, and they do not know about his addiction. The client has a partner who is not happy with the drug use.

The presenting problem from both the counselor's and the client's perspective

From the client's point of view, he does not have a drug addiction. He is not ashamed of this and considers the situation normal because he is full of energy and continues to work. Moreover, the client believes that everyone in the law field uses coke, including his father, and this is the culture of the sphere. According to the client, his condition is under complete control. Thus, the client claims that using cocaine after work is not an addiction but a way of working. However, the client is open to receiving help and working with a social worker. The only reason for this is his partner's dissatisfaction with his addiction. At the moment, the client is ready to communicate with a social worker but does not see any benefits in this.

From my point of view, the client has a pronounced drug addiction. Cocaine stimulates the sympathetic nervous system, thereby increasing the level of energy in the body. The body begins to overexcite, and all metabolic processes proceed very quickly, which leads to a state of euphoria. It explains the client's ability to multitask while sleeping is limited to two hours. Moreover, during the session, the frequent use of various mechanisms of psychological defense was noted. The client appealed to
