Substances

Water, salt water, and pulpy orange juice are different liquids. Their differences can be explained by chemistry. Think about pure water. If you freeze it, melt it, or boil it, it is still water. But, if you boil salt water, the water turns to gas and leaves the salt behind. If you strain pulpy orange juice, it loses its pulp. How does chemistry explain these differences? The answer has to do with the chemical makeup of these materials.

What are atoms, substances, and elements?

Atoms Recall that atoms are the basic building block of matter. Each atom has its own chemical and physical properties. These properties are determined by the number of protons the atom has.

Substances A substance is matter that has the same fixed makeup and properties throughout. A substance cannot be broken down into simpler parts by a physical process. For example, you can freeze, boil, stir, and filter water, but it is still water. The only way to change a substance is by a chemical process. The table on the next page shows some examples of physical processes and chemical processes.
