It is not to be taken for granted a management strategy based on the notion of openness, implied by common sense or tradition.

Because the system is open, it is possible that, in many respects, a system of openness is better for a system owner or customer than the system of closedness.

But, if we take the notion of openness as a management strategy, we must assume it always, and we must be aware of its limits of applicability. In practice, we have to find out whether the strategy is really suitable, and, moreover, to take things in their hands. It is not a good idea to apply common sense automatically, it is not a straightforward question to do this also.

Open systems have a complexity, a size, and the richness of features of systems is unmanageable things. A William of Occam's razor (which usually tells us to do the least things to achieve any goal) is not applicable to the variables such as quality, price, and so on, and the more the better often tells us that the best quality is better.

the 1990s, the number of people who have been infected with HIV has increased significantly. In 1990, there were approximately 1.5 million people living with HIV worldwide. By 2000, this number had risen to over 30 million. The increase in the number of people living with HIV has been attributed to a number of factors, including the widespread use of intravenous drugs, the use of contaminated needles, and the spread of the virus through sexual contact. The World Health Organization (WHO) estimates that there are currently over 30 million people living with HIV worldwide, with the highest prevalence rates found in sub-Saharan Africa and South America. The WHO also estimates that there are over 10 million people living with AIDS, the most advanced stage of HIV infection. The increase in the number of people living with HIV and AIDS has led to a significant increase in the number of people who are dying from these diseases.
