

Paper Example on Nationwide Death Penalty Policy Essay

Introduction

Controversy over the death penalty in the US is on national watch with the recent case of Missouri man charged with death sentencing by lethal injection. Death penalty faces criticism from different stakeholders, humanitarians, and international bodies. This is based on the provisions of the universal human rights which advocate for reduced and/or eliminated subjection to torture and suffering on death execution. However, the entire death penalty faces a wide resistance from different stakeholders based on their perception, ethical and moral view of the death sentencing (Braswell et al. 221). The US states have different rules and considerations that are adhered to with regards to capital offences. Some states have legalized the death penalty while others have voted against the death penalty citing their personal reasons. The disparities on death conviction rules across individual state legal systems call for concern on whether the nationwide death penalty policy should base on a unified policy.

Capital punishment is legal in 30 states of the US. Each state has its own reasons and regulations for withholding the death penalty. There are several reasons for withholding death penalties in these states. People cite different reasons in support of capital punishment. These may include serving as an ultimate warning to potential criminals on the outcome of life ending crimes (Braswell et al. 222). Some feel that the punishment gives closure to the victim's family members and a sense of justice being apprehended. Death penalties are used in some states as a way of instilling fear in criminals. Based on the case of Bundy's prison life, the nine year wait for execution witnessed exhaustion of all legal points in seeking change in his sentencing to life imprisonment than death sentencing. In reference to this case, it indicates that Bundy feared the taste of death would have otherwise preferred to spend his entire life in prison rather than be executed to death. In the same case, the death penalty is used as a mechanism of instilling fear in criminals. Therefore, the use of the death penalty serves as a fear factor for criminals.

Some people believe that it serves the murderers with a similar situation. Therefore, its perceived as the best answer to the murder since it extends the same treatment to the killer. In this case, equal judgement is believed to be attained. There have been arguments that the death penalty provides a softer execution based on the methods used to administer it, some arguments cite that the criminal should be exposed to similar death as the victim. However, this is highly rejected by humanitarians and global human rights bodies. Some states administer death penalty in better and safe ways that eliminate suffering and pain. Electrocution entails a head strapping which is strapped on a shaved part head. The electrocution strappings are fitted to a metal skullcap shaped electrode which aid in destabilizing the brain and therefore eliminates the pain. Electrocution seat was established in New York as an alternative humane method of death execution. Lethal injection was first used in Oklahoma, and it entails sending the inmate to sleep before administration of the lethal injection which leads to paralysis of the body muscle system and stopping of the heart functioning (Shirley et al. 17). However, not all the execution methods are not always cruel. Hanging, use of lethal gas and firing squad are used in some states but does not guarantee the safe death of the inmates. Utah recalled firing squad as execution as a death penalty. These methods, however, face criticisms from
