ways in which science and technology were employed in South Africa during the Second World War. A key theme underlying the chapters is the human mind in Chapter One, which addresses the submission of ideas to the Union Defence Force; this is the inventive mind in Chapter Seven, with its focus on aviation medicine; there is the description of human will and agency and their ultimate subordination to technology; and in Chapter Eight, which considers psychiatry, it is the measurement of the mind that is addressed on the part of medical experts. The final chapter concludes with the concept of the world mind and the use of science to create a new post-war world order. Each chapter employs a case study to highlight the ways in which science and technology were interwoven with society and identity, national, racial, and gendered, in wartime South Africa. The overarching theme explored is the hierarchies of knowledge creation, whether in relation to South Africa as a dominion within the British Empire, as a member of the Allies, or as a nation rife with societal tension exacerbated by the war.
