

UNIT IV REPORT WRITING

→ Research writing in general

→ Developing the outline

Having developed a chapter outline, the next step is to start writing. Though the way researchers organise their writing is extremely individualised, the following guidelines and format may prove helpful for beginners.

When writing about the information obtained in response to a question (variable), write as if you were providing answers to the following questions:

1. Why did you think it important to study the variable? What effects, in your opinion, may this variable have on the main variable you are explaining? (This is where you provide your own rationale for studying the variable.)
2. In the case of a cross-tabulation, what relationships have other studies found between the variables you are analysing? (This is where the literature review is integrated into the findings of the study.)
3. What did you expect to find out in terms of the relationship between the two variables? (If you have formulated a hypothesis, state it here.)
4. What has your study found out? (Provide the hard data from your study here, as tables, graphs or text.)
5. What does the data show? (Interpret the findings of your analysis.)
6. What conclusions can you draw? How do the conclusions drawn from your study compare with those from similar studies in the past? Does your study support or contradict them?
7. What explanation can you provide for the findings of your study?

In the suggested format in writing about information obtained from questions, notice that the literature review is integrated with the findings and conclusions. The extent of the integration of the literature with findings mostly depends upon the level at which you are writing your dissertation (Honours, Masters or PhD) – the higher the level, the more extensive the literature review, the greater its integration with your findings, and the more careful and confident you need to be about your conclusions.

Writing in qualitative research is more descriptive and narrative than analytical, hence you need to use your imagination in terms of placement of information, linkage between the thoughts and flow of language to make the writing interesting to read and meaningful in conveying the findings.

→ presentation.

→ Components: referencing

The report should follow an academic style of referencing.

there are four referencing systems from which to choose:

- 1.the short-title system;
- 2.the author–date system;
- 3.the reference by number system;
- 4.the author–number system.

You need to adopt the one that is acceptable to your university and academic discipline: "The first of these is used in most general books, the second mainly in science and social science books; the third and fourth less frequently".

→ writing the bibliography

Again, there are several well-established systems for writing a bibliography and your choice is dependent upon the preference of the discipline and university.

In the social sciences some of the most commonly used ones are:
