

Class Notes:

- What are the energetic needs of organisms?
- How do organisms interact in ways that meet their energy needs, including predator-prey interactions, trophic levels, and food webs?
- How do these interactions, especially changes in populations of keystone species, influence the structure and function of ecological communities?
- Producers bring energy into an ecosystem through photosynthesis; consumers acquire energy from producers; smaller, sessile consumers get eaten by larger, mobile consumers
- Primary producers → Primary Consumers → Secondary Consumers → Tertiary Consumers
- Only ~10% of energy is transferred up each step of the pyramid because of the 2nd law of thermodynamics (entropy)
 - Energy is lost as waste, heat, and living (cellular respiration)
- Regulators- keep internal environment constant
 - Regulate inside of the body when the outside changes
 - Maintain optimal internal conditions- Homeostasis, which is a negative feedback loop
 - Advantages- can go outside all the time
- Conformers- let internal environment match external environment
 - Advantages- use less energy
- Endotherms- maintain internal body temperature through metabolism (metabolically)
 - Endotherms eat food (reduced carbon), metabolize reduced carbon by oxidizing it (again), protons move across membranes into the mitochondria
 - Chemical energy → movement energy
- Ectotherms- body temperature is controlled by environment or behavior, not metabolism
- Smaller organisms require less energy
- Ectotherms has a larger change in metabolic rate per fold change in mass than endotherms because larger animals have proportionately less surface area so they lose proportionately less heat, so they lose less energy
- Aquatic carnivores require higher absolute amount of energy than terrestrial carnivores because they live in the water which is colder than land because it has a higher specific heat (meaning it takes more energy to heat up water than air)
- Size, basal metabolic rate, and surroundings all influence the energetic needs of organisms
