

20. Why is evolutionary economics not an empirical science?

Kurt Dopfer and Jason Potts

20.1 WHAT TYPE OF SCIENCE IS ECONOMICS?

In 1898, Thorstein Veblen asked ‘Why is economics not an evolutionary science?’ In 1920, Alfred Marshall famously claimed in the Preface to his Principles that the ‘Mecca of an economist lies in economic biology rather than in economic dynamics’. Since then, and especially after Richard Nelson and Sidney Winter’s (1982) An Evolutionary Theory of Economic Change, a growing body of evolutionary theory has found its way into economics, and an increasing part of economics has become evolutionary. This is particularly so in the economics of growth and development, the economics of innovation, technological change and institutions, and in the theory of industrial dynamics. Geoff Hodgson has been not only a pre-eminent scholar of this evolutionary transition (especially Hodgson, 1993, 2001) but also a key contributor to developing Darwinian Theory in economics (Hodgson, 1988, 1999, 2011, 2015; Hodgson and Knudsen, 2006, 2010, among many other works).

The purpose of this chapter, however, is to suggest that ‘is it physics or is it biology?’ is actually not the right question. That line of inquiry invariably pits economics as an evolutionary science against the standard presumption of economics as a mechanistic type of science based in physics (rather than biology), and in field-theoretic notions of general equilibrium as its main form of analytic expression and solution concepts (see Mirowski, 1989; Potts, 2000). Rather than asking whether economics is naturally a mechanistic or an evolutionary science, that is, whether it is properly based in physics or in biology, we ask a more general question about whether economics is naturally qualitative or quantitative?

The reason this seemingly philosophical question is interesting is because it takes us directly to the empirical nature of evolutionary economics. The main benefit of claiming that economics is naturally a mechanistic science is not just (as Alfred Marshall was wrestling with, see Potts, 2001) the easy adoption of off-the-shelf mathematical models of closed equilibrium
