

Roaring Spirit Bear by Ben Mikulson

APPLIED IN CLASS STRATEGY

Developed by Shaffer (1988), to promote active comprehension, the Directed Reading/Thinking Activity is based upon the idea that students can use their own experiences to comprehend the message of the author. This metacognitive strategy teaches students to acquire and activate their own purposes for reading. By setting their own purposes for reading, students develop their reading and thinking processes within the teacher. Through teacher questioning techniques presented here the students will interact with the text.

OBJECTIVES

STEP 1

- predicting – reading hypotheses that could govern all the text.

Begin by scanning the title, chapter headings, illustrations, and other explanatory materials. Have students make predictions as to what they think the reading will be about. Next, based upon the reading of a small segment of the text, the teacher guides students to predict what will happen next. After these initial predictions, the students either view pictures or listen to short passages from the text, presented in the order that they occur naturally in the text. During this step of the strategy, the teacher's role is to both activate and refine thought by asking students to defend their hypotheses. There is a time to guess, anticipate, and hypothesize. "What do you think?" "Why do you think so?"

STEP 2

- selecting – students are asked to read the material with the accuracy of their predictions.

Students are asked to support their predictions by locating the material in the text that will verify their responses. There are no right or wrong predictions, rather, some responses are judged to be more accurate than others. Reward the predictions so that they are accurate.

STEP 3

- checking – During this step, students read back through the text and gather evidence that they were able to verify their predictions.

Students verify the accuracy of their predictions by finding statements in the text and reading them orally to the teacher. The teacher serves as the monitor, refining and dispensing the reading/thinking process.

STEP 4

Repeat STEPS 1-3 as you continue to read.

ASSESSMENT

The teacher is able to assess several things from the CRTA. First, they are able to determine the ability of the students to read orally. Secondly, the teacher is able to determine the level of comprehension of the students. Third, the CRTA evaluates how actively students are searching for meaning within a given text. These assessments inform subsequent instruction in the text. The use of a picture book as an introduction to the more difficult text, engages readers in the subsequent reading and activation activities.
