Total: 5 17,500	Starting Date: August 2005 Ending Date: May 2006

5. BRIEF ABSTRACT OF THE PROJECT: (No more than 200 words)

Item response times can provide valuable information for assessing the degree to which an item pool has been compromised. Advance knowledge will tend to decrease the amount of time an examinee spends on the item. Increased advance knowledge should result in higher accuracy for rapid responses.

We propose to conduct a study to explore NCLEX data for evidence of shifts in response time distributions and accuracy of rapid responses. We will compare pilot test data to data from a single, later time point using three sets of candidates: 10,000 US-educated first time test takers, 10,000 non-US educated first time test takers, and 10,000 non first time test takers. Item responses, item identifiers, final score, and item response times will be needed for each candidate.

Item responses that show rapid correct responding will be identified and accumulated. For any items for which rapid responding is more common than anticipated, the item will be checked against other item characteristics from field test results. The goal is to develop a procedure that measurement practitioners can use to assess the degree to which advance knowledge has compromised their CAT pools. The NCLEX program can then make more effective decisions regarding item pool rotation.
