

The Documentary Film "The Corporation": Review

Topic: Entertainment & Media | Words: 556 | Pages: 2

The documentary film "The Corporation," released in 2003 and directed by the Canadian filmmaker Mark Achbar and Jennifer Abbott, discusses the phenomenon of modern corporations, i.e., large legal companies, the goal of which is to make a profit. Interestingly enough, at the legal level, corporations are treated as people who have rights and obligations. What is more, "The Corporation" promotes the idea that if a firm were a real person, it would be mentally ill and psychopathic. This inference of the film's creators is based on the fact that corporations are not capable of empathy, and the pursuit of their mercantile interests drives their actions.

At this point, one could argue that a corporation is closer to a state than to a person. According to An-Na'im Na (2009), a state is a "centralized, hierarchical" organization that is "differentiated into separate institutions and organs with their specialized functions" (p. 86). Indeed, commonly, corporations have a president and consist of multiple departments, just like the government structure of a nation is comprised of the legislative, judiciary, and executive bodies. Despite this, it is essential to notice that the comparison of corporations to people does not mean that they are equal. As Kirsch (2014) puts it, "corporations do not have the same rights as natural persons or citizens," and this legal concept of corporate personhood is needed to enable corporations to "make and enforce contracts on behalf of their investors" (p. 207). Nevertheless, it is curious that corporations, under some circumstances, take a state's responsibility.
