After identifying a statistically significant negative association between the frequency of self-reporting and the number of self-reported symptoms, we then conducted a series of sensitivity analyses to assess the robustness of our findings. We first examined the association between self-reporting frequency and the number of self-reported symptoms, controlling for age, sex, and education. We then examined the association between self-reporting frequency and the number of self-reported symptoms, controlling for age, sex, education, and income. Finally, we examined the association between self-reporting frequency and the number of self-reported symptoms, controlling for age, sex, education, income, and health insurance status. In all cases, the association between self-reporting frequency and the number of self-reported symptoms remained statistically significant.
