- These results are interpreted as suggesting that negative emotional IELs (e.g., IELs that report their brands contain a warning, or comments like "avoiding poisons for my infant's wellbeing") are more likely to be associated with negative attitudes toward the brand than positive comments.
- Comments that praise the brand and that promote repeat brands are more likely to be associated with positive brand attitudes.
- More call for praised brands than for dispraised brands' comments.
- There were no significant any linear associations between brands with electronic target for readers.
- The use of optical advertisements with their positive IELs.

Abstract: In this paper, we study the asymptotic behavior of the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function of a stationary process. We show that the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function converges to the spectral density of the process in the L^2 -norm. This result is a generalization of the result of Parzen (1969) for the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function of a stationary process. We also show that the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function converges to the spectral density of the process in the L^2 -norm. This result is a generalization of the result of Parzen (1969) for the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function of a stationary process.
