GENERAL DESCRIPTION

The Lab-Volt Robot System, Model 5150, provides complete and affordable training in the programming and operation of industrial robots. Through the curriculum and hands-on experience with the Robot System, students learn to create automated work cells.

The precision-built, articulated arm of the Robot represents an important step in automation and handling. A stepper motor, located in the base of the unit, provides horizontal rotation while five additional stepper motors, located in the shoulder, provide precision movements of the articulations and end effector. The Robot has five axes of rotation plus a gripper and is able to use all joints simultaneously to perform a programmed move sequence. Each articulation can be controlled and moved independently. Movements of the joints are accomplished by belts through a series of gears, while the gripper mechanism is activated by cables and belt-driven pulleys.

The base of the unit includes one connector for an external stepper motor which can be used for further experimentation, such as operating the Rotary Carousel. The Robot is equipped with four TTL (Transistor-Transistor Logic) inputs for the monitoring of input devices such as microswitches and four TTL outputs to communicate with other robot units or control external accessories such as a belt conveyor. Additionally, there are four 12 V dc device outputs, one is located in the shoulder and the others in the base unit. The shoulder-mounted output can be used to control end tooling such as the Magnetic Gripper. The I/O capabilities of the Robot allow interaction with external hardware via
