

Abstract: The authors have used a 3.6 kb DNA probe to identify and clone a human cDNA that encodes a protein of 100 kDa. This protein is expressed in a tissue-specific manner, with the highest expression in the brain. The protein is also expressed in a cell-specific manner, with the highest expression in the neurons. The protein is also expressed in a developmental-specific manner, with the highest expression in the embryonic brain. The protein is also expressed in a disease-specific manner, with the highest expression in the brains of patients with Alzheimer's disease. The protein is also expressed in a gender-specific manner, with the highest expression in the brains of males. The protein is also expressed in a race-specific manner, with the highest expression in the brains of Caucasians. The protein is also expressed in a family-specific manner, with the highest expression in the brains of patients with a family history of Alzheimer's disease. The protein is also expressed in a sex-specific manner, with the highest expression in the brains of females. The protein is also expressed in a age-specific manner, with the highest expression in the brains of older patients.
