Modern systems and their associated software tend to have a dual input system – that is, two separate, independent supplies of electrical energy, current to the two input plugs combined through a diode. One diode is used to supply the current to one set of plugs, while the second diode supplies the current to the other set of plugs. The diodes are electrically isolated from each other, so that a power failure on one side of the system does not affect the other side. This is a safety feature, because if one side of the system fails, the other side will still be able to operate. However, this is not a safety feature.
