1. Research the history of England's moth population that is peppered and provide evidence from scientific sources that show:

How a peppered moth population evolved to become peppered. Provide evidence from at least 3 scientific publications, with dates of publication, properly cited in the text and given the following format:

Introduction:

Charles Darwin revolutionized evolutionary understanding when he argued the theory of evolution by natural selection. One of his difficulties in demonstrating the theory, however, was the lack of any example of evolution in action. He proposed that such examples could be observed in "transient phases" of nature, although Darwin was somewhat of a pessimistic forecaster of evolution, which might never be observed in practice. Darwin's theory, however, was widely accepted in the scientific community, and the peppered moth provided the evidence of the peppered moth during evolution.

The peppered moth became a model organism for evolutionary biologists in the 1950s. There were three main reasons for this. First, the moth was common and widespread across the British Isles, and second, it generally had a single color form, the light form, which was widespread. Third, in 1848, a dark form of the peppered moth was first observed in a species of moth in England. The dark form was first observed in 1848, and the light form was first observed in 1848. The species of moth in England has since become a model organism for evolutionary biologists, and the peppered moth has been used to demonstrate natural selection in the laboratory.

Background:

The light form being a good model organism for evolutionary biologists. It was used to show how natural selection works. The light form was first observed in 1848, and the dark form was first observed in 1848. The species of moth in England has since become a model organism for evolutionary biologists, and the peppered moth has been used to demonstrate natural selection in the laboratory.

The following are the main points of the simulation:

1. The light form is a good model organism for evolutionary biologists.
2. The dark form is a good model organism for evolutionary biologists.
3. The species of moth in England has since become a model organism for evolutionary biologists, and the peppered moth has been used to demonstrate natural selection in the laboratory.
