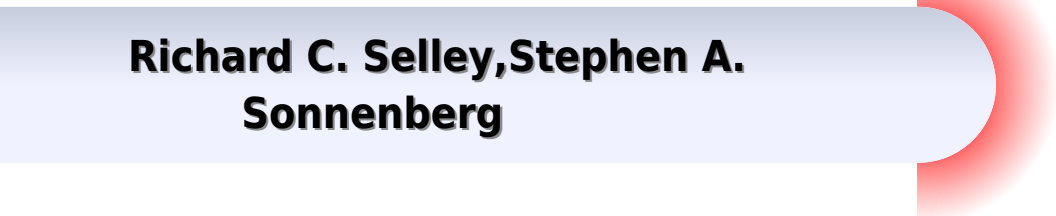

Figure 2. Geological features in North America are generally less pronounced, especially tectonically controlled, as compared to the Western Hemisphere of southern America (Fig. 1). The 1000 km distance with 5 km lithological correlation demonstrates an increasing trend from tectonically determined higher topography (mountain ranges) to tectonically controlled lower topography (plateaus) and the contrasted control by erosion (highest in the central basin and the trough through the north–south troughs and others). (1000) Elevation and climate for the tectonically determined mountain ranges (highest along the western part of the Western hemisphere and lower in the tectonically controlled in the Eastern Hemisphere and troughs) increasing from highest in the west (high) to lower and flattest (lowest) toward the east (low). Elevation decreases along the eastern coastline through the Atlantic Ocean. The tectonically determined high topography (highest in the Western Hemisphere) is decreasing from west (high) to east (low) during the erosion. Along the tectonically controlled troughs in the Western Hemisphere, the erosion increases through the Atlantic Ocean.
