Guideline Answers to the Concept Check Questions

Chapter 5 Valuation

Concept Check 5.1

1. What is valuation?

Valuation is the process that links risk and return to estimate the worth of an asset or a firm.

2. What are five types of value? How do they differ?

The following are five types of value.

- Going-concern value is the value of a firm as an operating business.
- Liquidation value is the projected price that a firm would receive by selling its assets if it were going out of business.
- Book value is the value of an asset as carried on a balance sheet.
- Market value is the price at which buyers and sellers trade similar items in an open market place.
- Intrinsic value is the value at which an asset should sell based on applying data inputs to a valuation theory or model.

These types of values can differ from one another. For example, a firm's going-concern value is likely to be higher than its liquidation value. The excess of going-concern value over liquidation value represents the value of the operating firm as distinct from the value of its assets. Book value can differ substantially from market value. For example, a piece of equipment appears on a firm's books at cost when purchased but decreases each year due to depreciation charges. The price that someone is willing to pay for the asset in the market may have little relationship with its book value. Market value reflects what someone is willing to pay for an asset whereas intrinsic value shows what the person should be willing to pay for the same asset.

3. Under what circumstances can the market value and intrinsic value of a financial asset differ?

Efficient market theory holds that market prices reflect the knowledge and expectations of all investors. Thus, the price for which a financial asset should sell in the market should be the same as its actual price. In market equilibrium, financial assets would be properly valued, not undervalued or overvalued. In less than perfectly efficient markets, market value and intrinsic value may differ.
