The Magic Model of Memory

THINK: How is selective attention guided by top down processing?

Selective attention is our ability to choose what stimuli to focus on. Top down processing is conceptually driven processing influenced by beliefs and expectations. The cocktail party effect is an example of how selective attention is guided by top down processing because in a crowded room we're more likely to pick out our name among all of the other voices.

Is memory a unitary phenomenon?

No, there are multiple processes in memory according to the magic model. There are multiple stages of memory such as encoding, storage, and retrieval. There are also using memory stores such as sensory memory, short term memory, and long term memory.

This can also be displayed with a serial position curve. A serial position curve displays recall of items on a list. Most people tend to call pay to either the primary or memory effect. The primary effect is the tendency to recall items at the beginning of a list and the memory effect is the tendency to recall items at the end of a list. This distinction is the evidence of the list shows that there's only so much short term memory can hold. Amnesia also loses the primary effect when they can't form new memories (anterograde amnesia).

THINK: Explain the "serial position curve" with what you have in the rest of the lecture.

The serial position curve is affected by our limited short term memory capacity (7 items  $\pm 2$ ). Our short term memory holds meaningful information (primary and memory effects, semantic encoding, etc.) but when new information is presented something has got to go.

What does it take to remember?

The three processes of memory are encoding, storage, and retrieval. Encoding is moving information from short term to long term, storage is successful encoding and maintenance of information in long term memory, and retrieval is moving memory from short term to long term when we need it.

There are two ways to encode information into long term memory. Automatic rehearsal is repetition to keep information in short term memory until it is moved to long term (ex repeating digits of a phone number). Elaborative rehearsal you assign meaning to the information to help it stick. This can be done using semantic encoding, or memory under the acronym. Semantic encoding like creating a story or relating it to your own life can also help. The most important thing to remember is that the relationship between encoding and retrieval matters as well. State-dependent memory relates to physical or emotional state. A memory is more likely to be triggered when you are in the same emotional state or under the influence of the same substances as when you encoded it. Context dependent memory relates to setting. We are more likely to remember information if you are in the same place you encoded it.

THINK: How does this relate to top down processing?

In top down processing, your brain fills in the blanks in your perception to form a complete picture. In elaborative processing you create meaningful information to assign to the information you're trying to recall.
