

 PTEXAM Two: Question 119

A physical therapist examines a patient with suspected vascular compression in the shoulder region. Which special test would be LEAST beneficial to confirm the therapist's suspicions?

1. Adson maneuver
2. Halstead maneuver
3. Froment's sign
4. Wright test

Correct Answer: 3 (Magee p. 442)

There are a variety of special tests designed to identify vascular compression in the shoulder. When performing the tests, a positive sign is often indicated by diminution or disappearance of a pulse or reproduction of neurological signs or symptoms.

1. Adson maneuver is performed with the patient in sitting or standing. The therapist monitors the radial pulse and asks the patient to rotate their head to face the test shoulder. The patient is then asked to extend their head while the therapist laterally rotates and extends the patient's shoulder. A positive test is indicated by an absent or diminished radial pulse.
2. The Halstead maneuver is performed with the patient sitting over the edge of a table. The therapist palpates the radial pulse and applies a downward traction on the symptomatic side. The patient is then asked to extend the head and turn away from the tested side. A positive test is indicated by an absent or diminished pulse.
3. Froment's sign requires a patient to grasp a piece of paper between the thumb and index finger. A positive test is indicated by flexion of the terminal phalanx of the thumb caused by paralysis of the adductor pollicis longus. The test is used to assess the integrity of the ulnar nerve.
4. The Wright test or hyperabduction test is performed with the patient in sitting or supine. The therapist moves the patient's arm overhead in the frontal plane while monitoring the patient's radial pulse. A positive test is indicated by an absent or diminished radial pulse and may be indicative of compression in the costoclavicular space.

 PTEXAM Two: Question 120

A physical therapist prepares to treat a patient with continuous ultrasound. Which general rule BEST determines the length of treatment when using ultrasound?

1. two minutes for an area that is two times the size of the transducer face
2. five minutes for an area that is two times the size of the transducer face
3. five minutes is the maximum treatment time regardless of the treatment area
4. ten minutes is the maximum treatment time regardless of the treatment area

Correct Answer: 2 (Prentice – Therapeutic Modalities p. 378)

The duration of ultrasound treatment is based on a number of variables including the treatment goal, the size of the area to be treated, and the effective radiating area of the transducer face.

1. Two minutes would not be enough time to use ultrasound in an area that was two times the size of the transducer face.
2. An accepted recommendation is that ultrasound can be administered to an area two to three times the size of the effective radiating area of the transducer face in a five minute period. This recommendation equates to roughly twice the size of the transducer face.
3. There is not a specified maximum amount of time when using ultrasound. Most often ultrasound is used for periods ranging from five to eight minutes in duration.
4. Ten minutes is a relatively long duration for treatment with ultrasound, however, this could be plausible in situations where the size of the area to be treated is large.
