

IN-TEXT CITATION: REFERENCING SOURCES WITHIN THE TEXT

Throughout the text of your paper you need to acknowledge the work used in your writing. Whenever you present a statement of evidence such as a quote, or when you use someone else's ideas, opinions or theories in your own words (paraphrasing), you must acknowledge the work(s) by providing the author's name and date of publication in text. An explanation of how to cite a work within your paper is given below and with each reference example in this guide.

If you use the name of the author(s) in your writing, place the year of publication of the work in parentheses after the author's name. This is known as a narrative in-text citation.

Mullane (2006) conducted research into the effect of. . .

If you refer to a work in the text of your paper and you are not using the author's name in your narrative, place the author's last name and the year of publication of the work in parentheses within or at the end of the sentence. This is known as a parenthetical in-text citation.

The research conclusively proved a correlation between the results (Mullane, 2006). A recent study (Wilson, 2015) shows the same correlation.

The choice between parenthetical and narrative in-text citation depends on the writer and the flow of the narrative.

If a paraphrase or summary continues over several consecutive sentences cite the work on first mention. It is not necessary to repeat the citation as long as it is clear to your reader that you are referring to the same work.

Fang (2017) has collected new data on the implementation of renewable technologies in Europe. Thirty-three percent showed an improvement in Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in the first 5 years. There was no negative impact on employment.

When a parenthetical in-text citation (with author and year) is used earlier in the paragraph, subsequent narrative mentions of the work in the same paragraph do not need to include the year. This rule only applies when the citation could not be confused with another in the paragraph and should only be used in instances when the name is given in the narrative, e.g.

Smith (2009) explained that. . . Smith also suggested. . .

Pay particular attention to the citation format required for references with multiple authors or editors. The use of et al. is used for three or more authors or editors. See examples for two authors, three to twenty authors and twenty one and more authors.
