

An MSP in the cloud supports the expansion of the service ecosystem by enabling new services in existing markets and by expanding existing services into new markets with minimum risk. By exposing standard service interfaces in the network, it enables third parties to integrate their services quickly, or to build new services based on the service components provided in the SDP. This creates the opportunity for new business models, for instance, for media distribution and advertising throughout multiple delivery scenarios.

Smarter TV: A key example of a smarter home service

Smarter TVs are leading the way for broadly accepted smarter home devices, promising a complete entertainment revolution. Through their broadband connections, they provide consumers with on-demand access to an unlimited array of entertainment options throughout the Internet. In addition to standard linear TV, they provide two-way interaction, personalized content, games and a wide range of personal and social communications, from instant messaging to social network applications. Televisions are about to become the next open application platform, similar to the application platforms on mobile devices.

Smarter TV creates an ongoing connection for device manufacturers and content owners with their consumers, setting up to new mainly discrete sales opportunities existed. This creates the opportunity for new business models through services. The intelligence of the new infrastructure, both in the device and in the network, enables consumers to achieve the personalization needed to navigate the large amounts of content now available. It provides the device manufacturers with the opportunity for user-driven product innovations. It also creates the opportunity for entirely new types of content for programmers, distributors and content owners.

Case example: Philips Net TV

Philips Net TV is a leading example of this development (see Figure 3). When a consumer brings the TV home, the TV connects itself to the WiFi network. Upon pressing the Net TV button, the user is connected to the service portal which presents a localized start screen in the user's own language. The services range from simple information services like weather and news, to games, e-commerce, social networks, personal media and user generated videos.

In the near future, premium services such as movies and "catch-up TV" will be added as well. Selecting from this wide array of Net TV services, the user can customize his start-up screen to put his favorites at his fingertips. A second button on the remote control brings the user to a program guide screen that provides detailed information about the broadcast programs available on the user and lets him tune directly to a program.
