Abstract

Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems in a community sample of young adults. The study also examined the association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported substance use, and the association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported academic performance.

Methods: A cross-sectional survey of 1,000 young adults (ages 18-25) was conducted. The survey included questions about self-reported mental health problems, self-reported substance use, and self-reported academic performance. The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was determined. The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported substance use was examined using logistic regression. The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported academic performance was examined using linear regression.

Results: The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was 15.2%. The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported substance use was positive. The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported academic performance was negative.

Conclusions: The results of this study suggest that self-reported mental health problems are prevalent in a community sample of young adults. The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported substance use is positive. The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported academic performance is negative.

Keywords: self-reported mental health problems, self-reported substance use, self-reported academic performance, young adults.
