Wendell's correspondence to his Kentucky physician, Dr. J. H. Matthews, in the 1850s, reveals how much he was dependent on others to make his home life tolerable. At first, he had an excellent housekeeper, and helped shape other people's lives. But Matthews (Vol. 2, 3, 4) tells us that even in the 1850s, when he had found a few of his Kentucky friends who could do his laundry, Matthews was still so dependent that people would not employ him because he was too feeble. As time went on, his increasing inability, particularly in the 1860s, to do things that Matthews thought he ought to do, made his growing dependence on others even more acute. Matthews' dependence on others was not a weakness, but a strength. It allowed him to achieve and to contribute. His letters are evidence that even his physical weakness, the great pain he felt, and the emotional distress, the growing hatred of his condition, did not prevent him from doing his best. He was a man of great strength.

Blackburn's transportation plans for Seattle generally met the criteria of the Redemptive Strategic Management planning approach. Transportation plans ranged to the general of budget costs and were made in the context of the three existing and future quarters of transportation and regional infrastructure and economic development and for the general budget. Additionally, the transportation plan for the immediate and immediate to the general budget approach that was used for budgeting and three years before general budget, economic development and infrastructure and economic development.

Health-care professionals' involvement in quality improvement (QI) programs requires specific skills and training. A QI program usually only flourishes if the people doing the improvement are trained and are offered the resources necessary to sustain their improvement efforts. Professionals need education in the general statistical techniques that are fundamental to QI. Some are not prepared to do this independently, so that the training itself needs to be designed. Some are concerned over whether the training will actually make differences and what their personal costs will be. The answer to these issues, then, requires that the following conditions must be met:

Students also often perceived academic achievement and work as good investments in the long run, in spite of the fact that they believed that learning, information, and knowledge investments are heavily under-invested in the U.S. (see Table 1). Most students also agreed with the statement: "The U.S. education system is not doing a good job of preparing students for the future." This statement was the only one that was not agreed with by more than half of the students. Even when the statement was reworded to focus on the future, the majority of students still did not agree with the statement. This suggests that the majority of students do not believe that the U.S. education system is doing a good job of preparing students for the future.
