- 1) The following are the major steps in developing a research proposal:
 - a) Selecting a topic: The topic should be interesting, relevant, and feasible. It should also be a topic that you are passionate about and that you have some knowledge about.
 - b) Conducting a literature review: This involves searching for and reading existing research on your topic. This will help you to identify gaps in the literature and to develop your research questions.
 - c) Formulating research questions: These are the specific questions that your research will aim to answer. They should be clear, concise, and measurable.
 - d) Designing the study: This involves deciding on the methods you will use to collect and analyze data. This includes choosing the research design, the sample, the data collection methods, and the data analysis methods.
 - e) Writing the proposal: This is the final step, where you write up your research plan in a formal document. This document should include an introduction, a literature review, research questions, a methodology section, and a conclusion.

Test results in Staphylococcus aureus and Escherichia coli strains (ATCC systems) did not attempt to measure the extent of their effectiveness against the most common bacteria. However, in the study that is our examination of effectiveness, the only phage that was successful in up to 100% infection in the tested E. coli strains was the one that had a 100% infection rate in the S. aureus strains. It is important to note that the study in Staphylococcus aureus was not a direct comparison of the phage to the other phages, but a direct comparison of the phage to the other phages. The phage that was successful in up to 100% infection in the S. aureus strains was the one that had a 100% infection rate in the S. aureus strains. The phage that was successful in up to 100% infection in the S. aureus strains was the one that had a 100% infection rate in the S. aureus strains.
