These findings are consistent with the idea that the brain is not a single unit, but a collection of many small units, each with its own function. This is the basis of the concept of the brain as a distributed system, where different parts of the brain are responsible for different tasks. This idea is supported by the fact that different parts of the brain are damaged in different types of stroke, leading to different types of deficits. For example, a stroke in the motor cortex can lead to paralysis, while a stroke in the language area can lead to aphasia. This suggests that the brain is a complex system, where different parts are specialized for different functions.
