University of British Columbia

Module C

Lesson 10

Learning Objectives

1. Describe why organisms have different potential for preservation;

Hard body parts are more likely to be preserved than soft body parts, animals with a skeleton or shell is more likely to be preserved. Animals that stay in one place are more likely to be preserved than mobile animals. And animals that live on soft (muddy) substrates are more likely to be preserved than animals that live on hard (rocky) substrates.

2. Compare and contrast body and trace fossils;

Body fossils are preservations of actual animal body parts, whereas trace fossils are tracks and evidence left behind by animals such as footprints, fecal matter, and burrows.

3. Compare and contrast the different methods of fossil preservation;

Direct preservation is the fossilization of body parts without any chemical or physical changes, except for the removal of soft tissue.

Indirect preservation:

- 1) Carbonization – Common in fish, insects, and plants. Fossils are preserved as thin films of carbon. First the material is buried, then a chemical reaction occurs where water transforms the material into carbon, finally, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen are driven off as gases.
- 2) Petrification – Common in bones and some groups of plants and shells. Material is first buried, water percolates through pore spaces and a supersaturated solution of calcium carbonate or silica precipitates minerals in the pore spaces. Spaces get completely filled up and the material becomes a solid rock.
