

There are redundant blanks behind and in front of the rows and frames. These blanks provide the time for the scanning and are not visible in the monitor screen. To be able to reconstruct the information of monitor screen from an obtained frame, the Horizontal Synchronization (HS) is very crucial since it is used as conversion from 1D data to 2D screen. Both the horizontal and vertical (refresh rate) synchronization signals exist in the actual transmission between monitor and PC. In the case of CE of VDC's, an attacker can only obtain the frames; however, Parkan et al showed that the synchronization signals could be obtained from the frames by using signal-processing techniques [13]. It is also known that the synchronization signals are constant and sufficient to solve them once; moreover, VESA standards provide synchronization signals if the screen resolution is known. For instance, the HS for 1280x1024 @60 Hz resolution is given as 65,983 HBL. Frame data including frame blanks and row blanks is converted to 2D screen as shown in Figure 1.

The existing ATLAS video rendering module requires the row frequency (input to HBL) which is obtained by VESA standard. An extensive report is published by Radon on oversampling risk of computer displays for analog and digital video platforms [14]. Signal processing applications for information extraction from the VDC's emissions is presented by Korkmaz [14].

Another type of the CE is composed of keyboard leakage. Keyboard is an important input device of computer processing confidential information. Although Han-Ping did some analysis on CE of the keyboard [15], a breakthrough has been achieved by Vassilov et al, who proposed a method to recover keyboard emissions with 95% success and a distance around 20 meters. Wang and Yu analyzed a representative control circuit of keyboards by focusing on the PS/2 keyboard protocol in order to find the sensitive signals causing CE [11]. A recent study on CE of keyboard, which investigates the information leakage on the ground line of the PS/2 serial cable, is presented in 2013 [16]. It has been shown that the keystroke signals might leak to ground line network which then be recovered on the other power outlets sharing the same electric line.

2.2. TEMPEST Test Procedures

For any equipment under test (EUT), it is necessary to prepare a document called as TEMPEST test plan that gives the detailed information about test procedures to be performed. A TEMPEST test plan document should contain the purpose of the test, technical information about the EUT,
