

Lights—Additive Color RGB Model

Before you turn on any lights, a room is black. By adding lights you add color. The three primary light colors are red, green, and blue. By adding different amounts of each color we can make any color we want. This method of additive color is known as RGB.

Computers and TV's are black when off, so they use lights: RGB. Red, green, and blue lights make all the millions of colors on your screen.

Lights add color to a black background. The three primary lights colors are Red, Green, and Blue (RGB)

Using the Color Chart:

Lights (RGB): Follow the arrows from the lights to the color you are making. Red and Blue make Magenta.

Pigments (CMYK): Follow the arrows from the pigments to the color you are making. Yellow and Cyan make Green.

Pigments—Subtractive Color CMYK Model

Pigments are dyes that color paints, inks, and even food. Pigments produce color by reflection. What you see is what is reflected.

You can tell that ink uses CMYK, because the paper is white.

CMYK—As you know from your color printer at home, color pigments are very expensive. To make black by mixing three pigments (CMY) doesn't make sense. So printers add black (K) to make four colors: CMYK. (K stands for black because B stands for blue.)

Pigments that absorb all colors look black.

Pigments that reflect all colors look white.

We see an object's color by reflection. A banana reflects yellow light. So it absorbs all other colors.

CMYK colors are made by reflection. Magenta reflects red and blue, so magenta absorbs green.
