Abstract: This study's overarching goal is to assess the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on the mental health of the general population. The study's primary objective is to investigate the prevalence of anxiety, depression, and stress among the general population during the COVID-19 pandemic. The study's secondary objective is to identify the factors that are associated with mental health outcomes during the COVID-19 pandemic. The study's methodology involves a cross-sectional design, using a convenience sample of the general population. The study's results show that the prevalence of anxiety, depression, and stress is significantly higher during the COVID-19 pandemic compared to the pre-pandemic period. The study's findings suggest that the COVID-19 pandemic has a significant impact on the mental health of the general population. The study's limitations include the use of a convenience sample and the lack of a control group. The study's conclusions are that the COVID-19 pandemic has a significant impact on the mental health of the general population, and that further research is needed to investigate the factors that are associated with mental health outcomes during the COVID-19 pandemic.

It could also be the case that the two different subgroups of the sample are not comparable. For example, the two groups may differ in important ways that are not captured by the variables in the model. For example, the two groups may differ in their access to health care, or in their health status. If these differences are not captured by the variables in the model, then the results may be biased.
