

Part II – Resolving Vectors to its Vertical and Horizontal Component

Any vector can be broken into components along two mutually perpendicular lines. It is most useful to break into x-components (along the directions of 0° on the force table) and y-components (along the directions of 90° on the force table).

Resolve in components a defined vector. Do this in three ways:

1. Experimentally

- First we define the vector to be resolved as the resultant vector with magnitude 2.94 N (mass = 300 g) and direction 50° .
- Next, set-up the equilibrant of the resultant vector through one pulley.
- Then align the other two pulleys at 0° (x-component) and 90° (y-component). Add enough mass to each pulley to achieve equilibrium. These weights hanging over the two pulleys are the magnitude of x and y component.

	Total mass (g)	Weight (N)	Angle
Resultant vector	-	2.94	50°
Equilibrant vector
x-component
y-component

2. Graphically

- Draw the resultant vector on a graph paper using suitable scale.
- Draw dotted lines from the tip of the vector straight down to the x-axis and straight across to the y-axis.
- Measure the magnitudes of the x and y components.
- Compare this result to the experimental result.

3. Analytically

- Determine the x and y components of the resultant vector geometrically using right angled triangle.
- Compare this result to the experimental result.

Part III – Constructing Vectors from x and y components.

A vector can also be determined from its x and y components. Determine the resultant vector from its x and y components using the following methods.

1. Experimentally

- Set two pulleys at 0° and 90° and hang a total mass of 400 g and 125 g respectively through the pulleys.
- Find the equilibrant using the third pulley.
- Use the equilibrant to find the resultant.

	Total mass (g)	Weight (N)	Angle
