Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of sedentary, middle-aged, obese women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The study population was divided into two groups: an intervention group and a control group. The intervention group participated in a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program. The control group did not participate in any exercise program. The study was conducted in a community setting. The primary outcome was the change in physical fitness, measured by the 6-minute walk test. Secondary outcomes included changes in body mass index (BMI), waist circumference, blood pressure, and health-related quality of life, measured by the SF-36 questionnaire. The results showed that the intervention group had significantly greater improvements in physical fitness, BMI, waist circumference, blood pressure, and health-related quality of life compared to the control group. The findings suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve physical fitness and health-related quality of life in sedentary, middle-aged, obese women.
