

ZONING SYSTEM DESIGN

Zoning any forced air system is easy once you know a few of the basic rules. The main consideration is to maintain a constant amount of air flow (CFM) through the HVAC Unit. This needs to occur when only one zone is open and if the zones are of varying size when the smallest zone is open. The other consideration is not to oversize a duct system too much in order to maintain adequate velocity and airflow when all zones are open and may be calling for conditioning on those design temperature days.

The design of the duct system for today's zoning is an important factor to a comfortable and efficient zoning system. The number of zones, along with their size, often determine the best type of design.

There are scenarios for zoning. The first, which is typically on new installations where the duct work can be designed for zoning would be to oversize the ducts for each zone in order to get more air to the zone when it may be the only one calling. The scenario for all others would be to use a by-pass damper to relieve the excess air pressure in the duct system when a minority number of zones are calling.

The reason for each zone duct being the same size is that any zone could be the only zone calling and therefore that zone must handle the CFM of the HVAC Unit. When the duct is sized for 2/3 of the total CFM the smaller size does restrict the airflow and forces the air at a higher pressure and velocity, however it does not increase the air typically over that static pressure rating of the blower motor, usually 0.5" W/C. This also keeps the air velocity from being noticeably noisy. Below is a quick guide to determine the minimum equivalent size of a zone duct for each size HVAC Unit.

System cfm	Zone Trunk Duct Size	Branch Ducts
800 cfm	12" x 8" or 12" Round	5 - 6" Rounds
1,000 cfm	14" x 8" or 12" Round	5 - 6" Rounds
1,200 cfm	16" x 8" or 12" Round	6 - 6" Rounds
1,400 cfm	18" x 8" or 14" Round	5 - 7" Rounds
1,600 cfm	20" x 8" or 14" Round	5 - 7" Rounds
2,000 cfm	22" x 8" or 16" Round	5 - 8" Rounds

Systems over 5 Tons typically are commercial and would use a by-pass damper to relieve the excess air pressure when the majority of zones shut down.

In retrofit and systems with 4 zones or more, oversizing the ducts is not practical. In these instances a by-pass damper is used to relieve the excess air back into the return air duct or dump the air into a central area of the building, such as a hallway, where often there is a common return. In this instance try to locate the by-pass air as far away from the return air intake as possible.

In new installations where ducts are being added it is recommended to size each zone duct the same and to size the duct for approximately 2/3 of the total HVAC System CFM. This is practical on systems with 2 or 3 zones and when all zones are approximately equal in size. This is NOT practical in an installation where 80% of conditioned area is one zone and 20% is the other zone.

The key to a good zoning system is to deliver the conditioned air to the calling zone as fast and quietly as possible in order to satisfy the demand. Whatever air cannot be directed into the zone must then by by-passed. This develops the formula for calculating the size of the by-pass damper.

Total CFM - Smallest Zone CFM = By-Pass CFM

Once the amount of by-pass air is known it is just common sense to size a duct adequately to handle the amount of air. White-Rodgers has both round and rectangular/square by-pass damper sizes.
