4. These results are interpreted as suggesting that negative emotional IELs (e.g., IELs that report their brands contain a warning, or comments like "avoiding products for my recent diagnosis") are more likely to be associated with negative attitudes toward the brand than are positive comments (e.g., "I received a diagnosis from this car dealership and the personal service was excellent").
5. Comments that praise the brand and that present negative brands and brands that criticize the brand are more likely to become associated with negative attitudes toward the brand.
6. More self-generated brands that are disconnected (generated "spontaneously") are more likely to be associated with negative attitudes toward the brand.
7. There were no associations among disconnected brands with emotional target brand ratings.
8. The use of self-generated advertisements results in less positive brand attitudes.

- If Wilson connecting this result to comparisons with other atomic components, the estimated rate constant is nothing more or less than the mean of such components in fact.
- If Wilson did not connect it to actual flight strength, we could also estimate the flight frequency

Abstract: In this paper, we study the asymptotic behavior of the spectral density of the sample covariance matrix of a stationary Gaussian process with a long-range dependence structure. The spectral density is assumed to be of the form $f(\lambda) = \lambda^{-2d} g(\lambda)$, where $d \in (0, 1/2)$ and $g(\lambda)$ is a smooth function. The asymptotic behavior of the spectral density is studied in the case of a stationary Gaussian process with a long-range dependence structure. The asymptotic behavior of the spectral density is studied in the case of a stationary Gaussian process with a long-range dependence structure.
