miscellany poems and tales Keepsakes they were called generically in England France and America their particular style might be Garland or Gem The Atlantic Souvenir earliest in this country so thrived during seven years 1826 1832 as to buy and unite with itself 1833 its chief rival the Token The utterly changed taste which smiles at these annuals as at the clothes of their readers obscures the fact that they were a medium not only for the stories of writers forgotten long since but also for the earlier work of Hawthorne By 1835 the New England Magazine had survived its infancy and the Southern Literary Messenger was born with promise Since then since the realisation of the definite form in Poe's Berenice the short story has been explored and tested to its utmost capacity by almost every American prose writer of note and by many without note as the chief American form of fiction The great purveyor has been the monthly magazine Before 1835 then is a period of experiment with tales after 1835 a period of the manifold exercise of the short story The tales of the former have much that is national in matter the short stories of the latter show nationality also in form Nationality even provinciality in subject matter has been too much in demand The best modern literature knows best that it is heir of all the ages and that its goal should be not local peculiarity but such humanity as passes place and time Therefore we have heard too much doubtless of local color At any rate many purveyors of local color in fiction have given us documents rather than stories Still there was some justice in asking of America the things of America If the critics who begged us to be American have not always seemed to know clearly what they meant still they may fairly be interpreted to mean in general something reasonable enough namely that we ought to catch from the breadth and diversity of our new country new inspirations The world then was looking to us in so far as it looked at all for the impulse from untrodden and picturesque ways for a direct transmission of Indians cataracts prairies bayous and Sierras Well and good But according to our abilities we were giving the world just that Years before England decided that our only American writers in this sense were Whitman Mark Twain and Bret Harte seventy years before the third of this perversely chosen group complacently informed the British public that he was a pioneer only in the sense of making the short story American in scenes and motives American writers were exploring their country for fiction north and south east and west up and down its history What we lacked was not appreciation of our material but skill in expressing it not inspiration but art We had to wait not indeed for Bret Harte in the 60's but for Poe in the 30's The material was known and felt and again and again attempted Nothing could expose more vividly the fallacy that new material makes new literature We were at school for our short story but we had long known what stories we had to tell In that sense American fiction has always been American Rajaratnam S. Rajaratnam, Fourteen stimulating literary works that shine a new light on Singapore's first foreign minister and one of its most eloquent and farsighted leaders, the late S. Rajaratnam. Celebrated as one of Singapore's founding fathers, very little has been said of his literary prowess. The seven short stories which he wrote in London in the 1940s were previously published in various collections alongside some of the most distinguished writers in the world. Impressed by his talent, George Orwell, who at the time worked for the BBC Eastern Service, recruited Rajaratnam to contribute scripts for the network. Upon his return from London, Rajaratnam stopped writing fiction and took to journalism. Excelling in political commentary and satire, he also wrote a number of politically charged radio scripts. This anthology collects a six-part series titled A Nation in the Making and another titled Looking Forward. All seven scripts were broadcast on Radio Malaya in 1957.
