Executive Summary

As the U.S. economy continues to grow, the need for a strong, stable, and secure energy supply is becoming increasingly apparent. The U.S. has a long history of energy independence, but in recent years, the country has become increasingly dependent on foreign oil. This dependence has led to a number of problems, including price volatility, supply insecurity, and environmental concerns. The U.S. must take steps to ensure a secure and sustainable energy future for itself and the world.

The U.S. has a number of advantages when it comes to energy. It has a large and diverse energy resource base, including oil, coal, natural gas, and renewable energy. It also has a strong and innovative energy industry. However, the U.S. must take steps to ensure that these advantages are fully realized. This requires a number of changes, including increasing energy efficiency, expanding production of domestic energy resources, and promoting the development of new energy technologies.

The U.S. must also take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its national security interests. This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. military's energy security, reducing the U.S. military's dependence on foreign oil, and promoting the development of new energy technologies that can be used in a variety of military applications.

The U.S. must also take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its environmental goals. This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. government's investment in renewable energy research and development, promoting the development of new energy technologies that are environmentally friendly, and reducing the U.S. government's carbon footprint.

The U.S. must take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its economic goals. This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. government's investment in energy infrastructure, promoting the development of new energy technologies that can create jobs, and reducing the U.S. government's energy costs.

The U.S. must take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its foreign policy goals. This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. government's investment in energy diplomacy, promoting the development of new energy technologies that can be used in a variety of foreign policy applications, and reducing the U.S. government's energy costs.

The U.S. must take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its national interests. This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. government's investment in energy research and development, promoting the development of new energy technologies that can be used in a variety of national interest applications, and reducing the U.S. government's energy costs.

The U.S. must take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its global interests. This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. government's investment in energy research and development, promoting the development of new energy technologies that can be used in a variety of global interest applications, and reducing the U.S. government's energy costs.

The U.S. must take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its future interests. This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. government's investment in energy research and development, promoting the development of new energy technologies that can be used in a variety of future interest applications, and reducing the U.S. government's energy costs.

The U.S. must take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its overall interests. This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. government's investment in energy research and development, promoting the development of new energy technologies that can be used in a variety of overall interest applications, and reducing the U.S. government's energy costs.

Key findings of the study include:

- The U.S. has a large and diverse energy resource base, including oil, coal, natural gas, and renewable energy.
- The U.S. has a strong and innovative energy industry.
- The U.S. must take steps to ensure that these advantages are fully realized.
- This requires a number of changes, including increasing energy efficiency, expanding production of domestic energy resources, and promoting the development of new energy technologies.
- The U.S. must also take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its national security interests.
- This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. military's energy security, reducing the U.S. military's dependence on foreign oil, and promoting the development of new energy technologies that can be used in a variety of military applications.
- The U.S. must also take steps to ensure that its energy policy is consistent with its environmental goals.
- This requires a number of changes, including increasing the U.S. government's investment in renewable energy research and development, promoting the development of new energy technologies that are environmentally friendly, and reducing the U.S. government's carbon footprint.

THE CHALLENGE Of North America's three main automobile manufacturers, only GM has a dedicated design center in Europe. To help GM Europe design cars that are more appealing to European customers, the company has created a new position: chief design officer for Europe. The job is to lead a team of designers who will work with GM's European marketing and sales departments to create cars that are more appealing to European customers. The first step is to create a design center in Europe. The second step is to create a design center in Europe. The third step is to create a design center in Europe.
