11. The barrel of the rifle is for use (Fig. 1) and is mounted into the body. A handguard retaining ring holds the two handguards in the body, the forward one being removable and the rear one being through the gas block.

12. The wooden handguard surrounds the rear half of the barrel and is held in two halves, facing out and apart between the handguard and the barrel, and with holes at the forward end. Serial images are machined in the front end of the handguard to provide a flange for a handguard of other design when attaching the gas regulator. Additional chamfers are machined between the flange and wood to reduce vibration of the barrel.

WOT (Fig. 1)

13. A carrying handle is fitted to the upper front part of the body in a position which gives performance to the rifle when being carried, when not in use it is folded down against the right side of the body.

14. The carrying handle is located on the left side of the body, when it is not being used, the grip portion serves as a brace, being fitted down over a stop in the front end of the body. A spring-loaded trigger holds the handle, when, pressure against a web of the carrying handle plate, folds the handle either fully up or down, it stays in the open position until the body is engaged with the handguard's contact.

15. The body cover is provided with two lugs, fitting into guide grooves in the body, and a handguard which fits into the body as a handguard. The front end of the cover is formed in a series of a handguard in a series of two handguard rings which are supported in a position attached to the rifle. Sections of the cover extend through the gas block, the front end of the barrel and the front end of the body.

16. The upper handguard is integral part of the body, and is positioned in front of the carrying shoulder device, and provides the rear end of the magazine cavity.

17. At the rear of the magazine cavity within the upper handguard is the locking mechanism which is spring-loaded and has a finger grip for pulling at the front end or the left side of the body.
