

1. Introduction.

Ipsos APOYO Opinión y Mercado, a Peruvian market research company, conducts a monthly survey in order to assess the attitudes and expectations of consumers in Metropolitan Lima. To synthesize the information gathered in those surveys, the business consulting firm Apoyo Consultoría calculates the Consumer Confidence Index of Apoyo Consultoría (INDICCA: Índice de Confianza del Consumidor de Apoyo Consultoría), which aims to measure the willingness of consumers to spend. This index is defined as the weighted average of responses of surveyed people on their current and expected appraisal on five areas: (i) consumer prices, (ii) job availability, (iii) the household's economic situation, (iv) the intention to make home improvements and (v) the country's economic situation (ten questions in total).

INDICCA is published in a report a few days after the end of every month. This short publication delay makes it a potentially powerful variable to anticipate aggregate private consumption in Peru, which is published with a two-month delay for the latest quarter. For these reasons, this index is closely followed by government agencies such as the Minister of Finance and the Peruvian Central Bank, as well as private sector firms. This index offers an alternative to the business expectation survey and the macroeconomic expectations survey, both of which are conducted by the Peruvian Central Bank. Carrera (2012) and Mendoza and Morales (2012) work on those surveys and complement this paper.

Despite its broad reach, the relationship between INDICCA and private consumption in Peru has not been yet assessed in applied work. Furthermore, although it is calculated in a similar way than other well-known consumer confidence indexes around the world (for example, the University of Michigan's consumer sentiment index); INDICCA has a relatively short existence, since it was first applied in March 2003. This short span makes it unsuitable for econometric evaluation, especially if we are interested in assessing its explanatory and predictive power with respect to private consumption. Nonetheless, out of the 10 questions comprising the construction of the INDICCA, the questions regarding the household's economic situation (questions number i and ii) have been asked since 1Q1994. This feature makes it more than suitable for econometric work that seeks to evaluate its explanatory and forecasting power of private consumption.

Although its long span is good news for the econometric reasons described above, a simple visual inspection shows that question (ii)¹ and private consumption growth in Peru are not highly correlated as seen in Figure 1. Similar conclusions have been obtained by Ludvigson (2004), Croushore (2006) and Madsen and McAleer (2000) when analyzing the relationship between consumer confidence indices and private consumption in the United States, if control variables such as income and wealth are taken into consideration. However, the search of a consumer confidence index which is more related to private consumption cannot be limited to the aggregate index as suggested by Jonsson and Lindén (2009). A sub-component or a special combination of them might yield better results.

¹ We only use this question since it is referred to the future economic situation (what households expect for the next twelve months) so we believe it is the best to forecast future consumption.
