INTRODUCTION: DIFFICULTIES IN EXPLAINING TRUTH

People often think and make assertions, some of which are true and others false. When a statement is asserted as being true, what is there about that statement that makes it true? The meaning of truth extends from honesty, good faith, and sincerity in general to agreement with fact or reality in particular.¹ The term has no single definition which is agreed upon by a majority of professional philosophers and scholars. Instead, there exist various theories of truth each claiming to be most suitable. The issues involved in truth go to include whether truth is subjective, relative, objective, or absolute. Truth seems to designate a property, for example in the statement 'what she wore was magenta,' 'magenta' designates 'a property...²; why shouldn't 'truth' in what is said or thought be true. G. E Moore succumbed to this kind of temptation: he admitted that he once held the view on grounds, presumably, like those which led him to the corresponding view about goodness that the truth is a simple un-analyzable property.³

We may also ask whether truth is a substance, a quality or even property of propositions. However, how do we mean when we say something is true or false. This problem has preoccupied philosophers from ancient to contemporary period. For better understanding of this notion let us first delve into its etymological meaning.

ETYMOLOGY OF TRUTH

The word 'truth' etymologically comes from Greek word alethes, aletheia (ἀληθεια) which means truthfulness, frankness, sincerity'. There is also a verb, 'alétheuein', which mean to speak truly, etc. These words are related to 'lanthanein', with an older form 'léthein', meaning 'to escape
